

Accumulation by Dispossession Through State-Corporate Harm: The Case of AngloGold Ashanti in Colombia

This book examines the case of a global gold mining company's activities in Colombia - from a new theoretical perspective: accumulation by dispossession through state-corporate harm. By adding a harm perspective to the concept of state-corporate crime, and contextualizing it within the global process of accumulation by dispossession, the book studies the case of AngloGold Ashanti in Colombia, using the concepts of friction and frontier to understand the relevant interactions that make up this case. The aim is to answer: What is the nature of the harms resulting from the interaction between the multinational corporation AngloGold Ashanti and the Colombian state? And, furthermore, how can this phenomenon be explained? To answer these questions, author Laura Gutierrez Gomez provides an account of the origin of current mining policies and regulations in Colombia, followed by an analysis of AngloGold Ashanti's entry into Colombia and the way in which it acquired several mining titles. She discusses the corporation's gold mining project La Colosa, located in the Tolima region, and the power dynamics that rule this mining frontier. After giving account of the interactions and harms that take place in the above-mentioned situations, Gutierrez Gomez suggests that state-corporate harm, stemming from the interaction between AngloGold Ashanti and the Colombian state, is the means by which the process of accumulation by dispossession materializes, thereby giving a possible explanation to the phenomenon under discussion.
