Not illustrated. 1899 Excerpt: ...of Madhu Sings widow. Having a direct interest in the death of Prithi Sing, the laws of common sense were violated in appointing her guardian, notwithstanding her claims as Pat Rani, or chief queen of the deceased. Prithi Sing, though he never emerged from the trammels of minority and the tutelage of the Chondawutni yet contracted two marriages, one with Bikaner, the other with Kishengurh. By the latter he had a son, Maun Sing. Every court in Rajpootana has its pretender, and young Maun was long the burden to the court of Amber. He was removed secretly, on his fathers death, to the maternal roof at Kishengurh; but as this did not offer sufficient security, he was sent to Sindias camp, and has ever since lived on the bounty of the Mahratta chief at Gwalior. Pratap Sing was immediately placed upon the gadi by the queen regent, his mother, and her council, consisting of the Feelban, and Khooshialiram, who had now received the title of Raja, and the rank of prime minister. He employed the power thus obtained to supplant his rival Feeroz, and the means he adopted established the independence of his old master, the chief of Macherri. This chief was the only one of note who absented himself from the ceremony of the installation of his sovereign. He was countenanced by the minister, whose plan to get rid of his rival was to create as much confusion as possible. In order that distress might reach the court, he gave private instructions that the zemindars should withhold their payments; but these minor stratagems would have been unavailing, had he not associated in his schemes the last remnants of power about the Mogul throne. Nujif Khan was at this time the imperial commander who, aided by the Mahrattas, proceeded to expel the Jats from the city of Agra. ...
