Not illustrated. 1864 Excerpt: ...coffins have also been discovered. All these, with the exception of the Southfleet examples, have been more or less ornamented,--not plain, like the one at Heigham. After this discovery of the coffin, I directed the workmen to make a very careful search for any portions of ornaments, coins, or other reliefs, that might possibly have escaped their notice. After some trouble they found two bronze torque rings, of which the engravings on p. 215 are the exact size. Both are encrusted with a fine green patina, and are of beautiful workmanship. The extremities are disunited, so that the rings may be termed penannular; but the ends might have been originally soldered together. Whether they were deposited with the skeleton found in the coffin cannot now be ascertained. I have every reason to believe they were so enclosed, but thrown out by the workmen. The form, pattern, and workmanship, lead to the conclusion that they are early Saxon; and this is not improbable, as the Romans and their Saxon successors mingled together, each being influenced by the taste and habits of the other. And this notion is also confirmed by an opinion expressed in a note to me from Mr. Albert Way, to whom I shewed them. He writes that the peculiarity of the specimens under consideration lies chiefly in their being Tore-fashioned in the construction, and intimates that he does not see why the coffin should not be late Roman and the rings Saxon; and adds that he does not remember to have seen amongst the innumerable bronze rings and buckles any specimen actually twisted, I suppose to give greater strength. The condition of the inner surfaces is also very remarkable: at first sight they look as if they had been hammered to flatten the threads of the twist, but I believe it is the ...
