E. by E., distant six or seven miles. The wind decreasing as the day advanced, and the Tyger and Newcastle failing very ill, though they carried all the fail they were able, it was near fun-fet before our fleet could form their line. About a quarter after five, our squadron being nearly abreast of the enemy, they wore, and came to the wind on the other tack; upon which our fliips tacked, the rear first, and stood for the enemys fquadron. Our fleet was now about four miles distant, with very little steerage way, and continued fo till near ten; when a fresh breeze fpringing up from the S. fi. V., our fquadron hauled clofe to the wind under their topfails, and formed the line ahead. This fliift brought the enemy astern, and a little upon the weather quarter of our line) but it foon after proving hazy, our fleet lost fight of them. What is very remarkable, the enemy made no signal, in this or the preceding night, either with guns or lights. The Revenge was fent to look out astern, but, not perceiving them, flie was fent ahead; and, about eight oclock next morning, flie made the signal for feeing four fail to the N. E.; on which a general rhafe was begun by the whole fquadron, and continued till rear two in the afternoon; at which time, feeing no more than two ships, and the Admiral finding he could not come up ith thofe, he made the signal for the Revenge to come into the fleet; when he stood to the northward, and made all the fail he could to get off Pondicherry, justly concluding the French fquadron was bound thither.
