Not illustrated. 1839 Excerpt: ... the inspection of the curious. The proscenium, orchestra, and consular seats, with a portion of the corridors, have, even in their present ruinous state, a very imposing effect; and this is heightened by the exclusion of the light of day, the torches throwing a lurid glare on some portions of the building, while others are left in deep shadow. The statues and other ornaments found in Herculaneum have all been removed, and nothing of its former decorations remain, save some arabesques, and portions of stucco painted with a crimson color of extraordinary richness and lustre. The wild and grotesque figures and animated gesticulations of the guides, waving their torches, which cast lugubrious gleams of light around this sepulchre of a dead city; the dense and oppressive air, and the reverberation of the sound of the carriages passing and repassing through the streets above it, have an indescribable influence on the mind. One consequently ascends into light and life again with feelings of melancholy, which not even the beautiful scenery that courts the eye can banish for some time. We spent some hours in the Museum at Portici, which contains many of the treasures found at Pompeii and Herculaneum. Some of the paintings are very curious, and all are highly interesting. The gods and goddesses of the Pagan mythology, Bacchusses, Bacchantes, nymphs, boys, birds, animals, fishes, and insects, are the general subjects, and are executed with much spirit. But those paintings which represent scenes in the domestic life of past ages, have a superior attraction: hence a garden, very similar to the Italian gardens of the present day, is beheld with interest; as is a lady looking at herself in a metal mirror; and other groups.

One of the most touching mementoes of
